A pioneer underwater film producer and photographer, Stan Waterman has won five Emmy awards and received numerous other honors and awards in a career which spans nearly fifty years in the scuba diving industry.

Having studied English and Shakespeare, this Dartmouth graduate has used his life-long love of language to create a unique style for which he has become a world-famous icon of the diving world.

Mr. Waterman began with a dive charter business in the Bahamas, which progressed to world travel, filming, discovering and lecturing. A year-long chronicle of his family's life in Tahiti was purchased and aired by National Geographic, which further anchored his destiny to become the world's foremost expert in underwater cinematography.

Mr. Waterman has produced documentaries, television series and films for National Geographic, ABC, and ESPN, but is best known for his work in commercial film.

He collaborated with Peter Gimbel on the classic shark film, Blue Water, White Death, and with his close friend Peter Benchley on The Deep, where Mr. Waterman was co-director of underwater photography and second unit. He went on to work again with Benchley on ten years worth of American Sportsman shows for ESPN.

In 2001, the International Scuba Diving Hall of Fame named Stan Waterman as an inductee in its charter year. Mr. Waterman has also received numerous other awards including the Cousteau Diver of the Year Award, two Gold Medals from the UK Underwater Film Festival, four Golden Eagles, and the Reaching Out Award from the Diving Equipment and Marketing Association. Stan Waterman and his family were featured in a Discovery Channel two-hour biographical special, The Man Who Loves Sharks.

Mr. Waterman continues to dive, film, lecture, and host dive tours. He emcees at many consumer scuba diving shows and underwater film festivals each year in North America and Great Britain.

Stan Waterman's book, Sea Salt: Memories and Essays, New World Publications 2005, has received rave reviews from the dive industry and literary community alike.
